DOCUMENT RESUME

ED 400 556 CS 215 530

AUTHOR Bolin, Bill
TITLE A (Corner of the) Field Defined: Contemplating Name Changes in the Ongoing Professionalization of Basic Writing.
PUB DATE 10 Oct 96
NOTE 14p.; Paper presented at the Watson Conference on Composition and Rhetoric (Louisville, KY, October 10, 1996).
PUB TYPE Speeches/Conference Papers (150) -- Viewpoints (Opinion/Position Papers, Essays, etc.) (120)

EDRS PRICE MF01/PC01 Plus Postage.
DESCRIPTORS Administrator Attitudes; *Basic Writing; *Higher Education; Instructional Development; Instructional Improvement; *Intellectual Disciplines; Remedial Instruction; Scholarly Journals; Undergraduate Students; Writing Skills; Writing Teachers
IDENTIFIERS Basic Writers; Faculty Attitudes; *Journal of Basic Writing; *Professionalization

ABSTRACT

A recent call by its editors to rename the "Journal of Basic Writing" has ramifications toward professionalization of and a wider respect for the discipline of basic writing. Basic writing has been defined differently from composition studies which, in turn, has been distinguished from English studies. This defining process has moved alongside, or as a reaction to, the process of disciplinarity. Basic writing students are generally constructed as those who find academic writing tasks especially challenging. This deficit definition has encouraged administrators to define the field in a particular way by staffing it with temporary adjunct faculty and teaching assistants. If basic writing is to be considered a viable field of study by those not engaged in composition studies, prestige could be provided by using a higher number of full-time, tenured faculty. Another step is for the flagship journal in basic writing to make initial moves and to find a name for that journal that reflects such work and presents a positive image of its subject. The professionalization of basic writing will follow a name change, garnering more respect from both within and without the academy for what scholars in basic writing do. (Contains 31 references.) (CR)

Bill Bolin
Texas A&M University-Commerce
Watson Conference
10 October 1996

A (Corner of the) Field Defined: Contemplating Name Changes in the Ongoing Professionalization of Basic Writing

At a symposium in 1994, Mel Elfin, Special Projects Editor for US News and World Report and the one in charge of the annual special edition on the ranking of colleges, said that he has noticed a disturbing trend taking place the last few decades. Elfin claimed that the relationship between "town" and "gown" had changed recently, that those outside of academe no longer had the same "awe"--and I use his word here--for the professoriate that he perceived they used to. He went on to address this lack of former respect in terms of the university's being too accessible, with accommodations made for a wide diversity of students as never before seen. And he described these accommodations as negative factors on the mission of higher education in the United States. Elfin's remarks come to mind as I ponder the directions under consideration by scholars and practitioners of Basic Writing. In this presentation I want to explore the connections between naming a segment of scholarly inquiry Basic Writing and the professionalization of that segment, focusing especially on the recent call to rename the Journal of Basic Writing. Also, I want to describe a number of passages in the written record of the term Basic Writing that illustrate the contention of definitions surrounding that term in the past two decades or more. Finally, I'd like to ponder aloud on the possible ramifications of a new name for the Journal of Basic Writing, as called for recently by its editors, toward professionalization of and wider respect for a discipline of Basic Writing.

In his Topics, Cicero says, "When you have taken all the qualities which the thing you wish to define has in common with other things, you should pursue the analysis until you produce its own distinctive quality which can be transferred to no other thing" (qtd. in Crowley 71). In such a manner has basic writing been defined differently from composition studies which, in turn, has been distinguished from English studies. This defining process has moved alongside, or perhaps as a reaction to, the process of disciplinarity. In other words, when scholars distinguish a segment of their field (basic writing from composition studies) through their own inquiry, then through scholarly journals, then through graduate courses in that segment of the field, they are shaping the definition. The current editors of JBW, Karen Greenberg and Trudy Smoke, seek to open up discussion, although perhaps not directly, about the "naming" of a particular segment of composition studies tailored for students who, in the words of Mike Rose, "come to us with significant difficulties" (qtd. in Greenberg, Smoke 3) as a step toward reconceiving that segment of the discipline in what could likely be a gesture toward the disciplinarity of basic writing (or whatever it may be called). But first, here is a survey of previous uses of the term basic writing (see Bolin):

Although there are a number of other terms used to describe underprepared undergraduate writers and the courses that define them, the conception of the Journal of Basic Writing in 1975 appears to have established basic writing as the general description of pedagogy geared toward students who do not generally utilize conventional academic discourse (Gray 3; see also Kasden 4). Mina Shaughnessy (1994) points out in the 1970s that "Basic writing, alias remedial, developmental, pre-baccalaureate, or even handicapped English, is commonly thought of as a writing course for young men and women who have many things wrong with them" (321). In a footnote a dozen years later, Mike Rose qualifies his remarks thus: "I will use the adjective 'remedial' and occasionally the adjective 'basic' ...with some reservation, for they are often more pejorative than accurately descriptive" (353). And by 1987, Theresa Enos writes, "Basic writing is a troublesome and diverse term, having become so inclusive that it seems to defy formal definition" (v).

Noting in 1976 that the "teaching of writing to severely underprepared " students is "the frontier of a profession," Shaughnessy (1987) elaborates on the pejorative nature of the terms associated with these students. Remedial, English for the disadvantaged, compensatory, developmental, and basic all suggest, to varying degrees, that the shortcoming is within the student more so than within the student's educational experience (177; see also Errors and Expectations 4). Moreover, she points to the relativeness of such labels: "One school's remedial student may be another's regular or even advanced freshman" (177--78). The tenor of Shaughnessy's essay here is sympathetic to the students who, through open admissions, have been given an opportunity to experience higher education. In fact, at times she calls them "new students," certainly a more respectful label than the conventional ones used widely that suggest intrinsic fault. But she stresses the differences in learning techniques and timetables, not in ability, per se: "Aptitude, [John] Carroll would say, is simply the amount of time required by the learner to attain mastery of a learning task, not a limit on the types of tasks a person can successfully undertake" (189). Shaughnessy (1975) also locates the necessity of basic writing instruction in the interactive web of the students, the teachers, and the academy (2). In a bibliographic essay that provides a wealth of sources concerning basic writing, Andrea Lunsford (1987) echoes Shaughnessy's convictions that medical terminology be abandoned in favor of "moving [basic writing] from the fringes of concern into the full academic community where it becomes...an opener of long-closed doors to academic discourse, to intellectual rigor, to the way writing helps create ourselves and our worlds" (226). However, the nature of defining differences in writing ability presupposes the language of "deficit theory" (Hull, et al. 324) because one is forced to show how a particular concept is different from, and inferior to, the prototype. In fact, the primary metaphors for basic writing betray a reliance on deficit. The inside/outside metaphor has been most prevalent in the discipline (Wall, Coles 244; Foster 161-62), allowing for a mainstream/margins metaphor with David Bartholomae and Anthony Petrosky's Facts, Artifacts, and Counterfacts (Wall, Coles 232) and the boundary/passport metaphor (DiPardo 5, 169). More recently, Bruce Horner explores the frontier metaphor first described by Shaughnessy by pointing out such a metaphor's pragmatic uses for developing a scholarly area of inquiry ripe for experimentation as well as the pitfalls inherent in avoiding the histories of a discipline (210-11). Such an avoidance of history keeps basic writing on the margins of larger scholarly disciplines because it is perceived inaccurately as a short-term fix to a "new" problem (212).

Basic writing students are generally constructed as those who find academic writing tasks especially challenging, and basic writing is often defined by certain artifactual evidence. Shaughnessy (1987) describes basic writing students as those who "produce...small numbers of words with large numbers of errors" and who seem to "be restricted as writers, but not necessarily as speakers, to a very narrow range of syntactic, semantic, and rhetorical options" (179). Jon Jonz, in 1987, details a local technique which identifies those students whose ACT or SAT English scores fall below certain thresholds as candidates for basic writing (24). Similarly, in a 1993 article, basic writing is "clearly" identified as "relatively brief and unelaborated, with little subordination...many intrusions from oral language that are less appropriate to written language...punctuation, capitalization, spelling [which] are erratic" (Kutz, et al. 39), and it reflects consistent prewriting strategies (Perl 22), thus wilting in the face of a product-oriented pedagogy (Perl 15). Also, basic writers are those who "lack the skills needed to write at all" and who would benefit from the lessons on writing from classical rhetoric (Tiner 374). Gail Stygall (1988) notes yet another facet of the basic writer, marked tenacity in the face of unusual adversity: "Like two boxers who are bleeding and winded but not yet ready to quit, basic writers reel into the freshman classroom each year" (28).

Definitions of basic writing and basic writers, however, are also based on characteristics not readily observed (see, for example, Kutz, et al. 40). In an early issue of JBW, Lunsford (1978) adds a dimension by noticing in basic writing students "a consistent egocentricity" which prevents their adopting a distanced voice as generally desired in academic writing (3). And in contrast to the scholarship that defines basic writing primarily on the basis of semantics or syntax but related loosely to Lunsford's view, E.D. Hirsch sees a culturally situated cause: "...that whole system of unspoken, tacit knowledge that is shared between speaker and writer" (29). A somewhat different perception of cultural causes is based on economic and social factors, those which might inhibit success in academic settings because such success is neither prevalent nor outwardly esteemed so that those from working-class backgrounds or crime-ridden neighborhoods must make a deliberate, calculated choice to succeed in academia (Rondinone 884-85). Further, Min-zhan Lu points to the investment of culture in language, taking exception with what she terms Shaughnessy's essentialist view of linguistic codes as if those codes can exist separately from "the dynamic power struggle within and among diverse discourses" (329).

George Jensen spotlights the contestation between definitions of basic writing as symptom and as social interaction when he observes that many researchers tend to ignore Shaughnessy's thesis that basic writers are diverse and complicated. He worries that the individual characteristics, such as insecurity, preoccupation with "errors," holistic thinking, and gregariousness, that these researchers identified will combine to form an inaccurate generalization of the basic writer (53--54), a negative picture trained on the faults of basic writers because, for the most part, the researchers "have dealt with isolated personality traits rather than a humanistic personality construct" (56).

The term basic, however, has not always pointed to deficiency. In a 1937 handbook titled Basic Writing: A Textbook for College Freshman and described as "the kind of book which can be used by all freshman regardless of their ultimate intentions" (Moffett and Johnson vii), basic writing represents the essential knowledge about composing required at the college level. The editors write in the Introduction, "For those who are seeking merely a competence in English composition, the sections on the word, sentence, paragraph, exposition, and letter writing constitute a complete course" (Moffett and Johnson viii).

Since the mid-seventies, however, basic writing has been consistently, if not exclusively, connected with remediation, marking it as a stop-gap measure for a temporary problem (Stygall, 1994, 339) and encouraging administrators to define the field a particular way by staffing it with temporary adjunct faculty and teaching assistants according to different works by Gail Stygall and Anne DiPardo (Stygall, 1994, 339; DiPardo 170). Such a deficit-oriented use of the term also leads to one of the greatest ironies of any contemporary definition: unlike students who enroll in technical writing or creative writing classes to work toward identification as technical or creative writers, students enrolled in basic writing classes begin with identification as basic writers and work to distance themselves from it.

If basic writing is to be considered a viable field of study by those not engaged in composition studies, a number of steps must be taken. Certainly, a higher number of full-time, tenured faculty teaching basic writing courses and doing research in basic writing would provide some prestige because of the monetary investment in salary required by the university. Such staffing of more highly ranked faculty has little or nothing to do with competence or enthusiasm but has everything to do with the university's commitment of more expensive resources to basic writing. Another step, of course, is for the flagship journal in basic writing to make initial moves. Lynn Z. Bloom gives a number of fine reasons, beginning with her assertion that Shaughnessy's decision to call underprepared writers basic writers was carefully calculated (9). Indeed, if the common perception of basic writing is of a quick fix to get students up to speed but the real work in basic writing is actually more involved with varieties of language use, then the leading journal must contemplate finding a name that reflects such work, especially since basic writing has picked up negative connotations. In fact, Bloom points out that about one third of articles published in JBW the past ten years addressed issue that might be considered outside the parameters of basic writing, and she continues with the thought that "It would be regrettable if a title originally meant to be liberatory had a ghettoizing effect on its subject (11). Bloom's subsequent reasons for changing the name deal with the importance of a journal title's presenting a positive image of its subject, a charge made obvious by the deficit theory which now haunts the term. In a recent and similar move, the name of Freshman English News changed, after 20 years, to Composition Studies/Freshman English News because the editor wanted the journal's name to reflect the changing course names of what had been previously termed "freshman English. Also, the published articles delved into a number of issues related to composition as a subject of inquiry and not exclusively into the practice of first-year writing curricula (Murphy 3).

Other than outlining criteria for considering a journal title, Bloom shies away from offering any specific suggestions for changing the name of JBW, because she is a self-described "occasional contributor," thereby placing her on the fringe of an already marginalized area of study. However, in the following article of that issue, Alan Purves does not likewise shy away. His offering of the title Journal for Imagining Composition arises out of a study of the various ways in which basic writing has been and can be perceived. Purves argues that technology is changing the nature of composition studies to the extent that reverberations can be picked up in basic writing (18-19). Since writing has changed, one can logically argue that the term basic--and all its deficit oriented synonyms has changed, as well. Purves opens up the possibility of looking at composition studies, and the abilities to engage in composition activities, as something other than linear. Much as technology, specifically hypertext, has intruded upon the previous notions of reading as predominately linear, it has also paved the way to think of basic writing in terms other than the one threshold to some other kind of writing. Writing ability can be perceived as something other than a one-lane continuum, with some students passing the threshold through placement tests and others sent back to the starting place because of the same tests.

"Composition" might be considered a variety of activities and abilities: organizing, editing, manipulating computer parts, accessing other texts, editing, and so on. And any one of us could be considered at the "basic" level for any one or more of these activities at a particular time. This spatial and more dynamic view of composition and of the situating of "basic" within it comes comfortably close to Lunsford's earlier call to move basic writing from the fringes into the full academic community. Indeed, even while composition studies struggles to define itself as a bona fide scholarly discipline, with its own journals, tenured faculty, graduate programs, and scholarly books, its satellite disciplines of technical writing, computers and writing, writing center theory, and even basic writing would benefit. But first we've got to do something about that name. The professionalization of basic writing will follow a name change that will garner more respect from both within and without the academy for what scholars in basic writing do.

Works Cited

Bloom, Lynn Z. "A Name with a View." Journal of Basic Writing 14.1 (1995): 7--14.

Bolin, Bill. "Basic Writing/Writers." Keywords in Composition Studies. Ed. Paul Heilker and Peter Vandenberg. Portsmouth, NH: Boynton/Cook Heinemann, 1996. 26-29.

Crowley, Sharon. Ancient Rhetorics for Contemporary Students. New York: Macmillan, 1994.

DiPardo, Anne. A Kind of Passport: A Basic Writing Adjunct Program and the Challenge of Student Diversity. NCTE Research Report No. 24. Urbana, IL: National Council of Teachers of English, 1993.

Enos, Theresa, ed. A Sourcebook for Basic Writing Teachers. New York: Random House, 1987.

Foster, David. A Primer for Writing Teachers: Theories, Theorists, Issues, Problems. Portsmouth, NH: Boynton/Cook Heinemann, 1992.

Gray, Barbara Quint. "Introduction." Journal of Basic Writing 2.2 (1979): 3--5.

Greenberg, Karen, and Trudy Smoke. "Editors' Column." Journal of Basic Writing 14.1 (1995): 1--6.

Hirsch, E.D., Jr. "Culture and Literacy." Journal of Basic Writing 3.1 (1980): 27--47.

Horner, Bruce. "Discoursing Basic Writing." College Composition and Communication 47 (1996): 199--222.

Hull, Glynda, Mike Rose, Kay Losey Fraser, and Marisa Castellano. "Remediation as Social Construct: Perspectives from an Analysis of Classroom Discourse." College Composition and Communication 42 (1991): 299--329.

Jensen, George H. "The Reification of the Basic Writer." Journal of Basic Writing 5.1 (1986): 52--64.

Jonz, Jon. "Using Pooled Judgments to Develop Tests of Basic Writing." Journal of Basic Writing 6.2 (1987): 16--25.

Kasden, Lawrence N. "An Introduction to Basic Writing." Basic Writing: Essays for Teachers, Researchers, Administrators. Ed. Lawrence N. Kasden and Daniel R. Hoeber. Urbana, IL: National Council of Teachers of English, 1980. 1--9.

Kutz, Eleanor, Suzy Q. Groden, and Vivian Zamel. The Discovery of Competence: Teaching and Learning with Diverse Student Writers. Portsmouth, NH: Boynton/Cook Heinemann, 1993.

Lunsford, Andrea A. "Aristotelian Rhetoric: Let's Get Back to the Classics." Journal of Basic Writing 2.1 (1978): 2--12.

Lunsford, Andre. "An Update of the Bibliography on Basic Writing." Teaching Composition: Twelve Bibliographic Essays. Ed. Gary Tate. Fort Worth: Texas Christian University Press, 1987. 207--26.

Lu, Min-zhan. "Redefining the Legacy of Mina Shaughnessy: A Critique of the Politics of Linguistic Innocence." The Writing Teacher's Sourcebook. 3rd ed. Ed. Gary Tate, Edward P.J. Corbett, and Nancy Myers. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994. 327--37.

Moffett, Harold Y., and Willoughby H. Johnson. Basic Writing: A Textbook for College Freshman. New York: Harper and Brothers, 1937.

Murphy, Christina. "Letter from the Editor." Freshman English News 19.3 (1991): 3.

Perl, Sondra. "A Look at Basic Writers in the Process of Composing." Basic Writing: Essays for Teachers, Researchers, Administrators. Ed.

Lawrence N. Kasden and Daniel R. Hoeber. Urbana, IL: National Council of Teachers of English, 1980. 13--32.

Rondinone, Peter. In "Symposium on Basic Writing, Conflict and Struggle, and the Legacy of Mina Shaughnessy." College English 55 (1993): 879--903.

Rose, Mike. "Remedial Writing Courses: A Critique and a Proposal." The Writing Teacher's Sourcebook. 3rd ed. Ed. Gary Tate, Edward P.J. Corbett, and Nancy Myers. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994. 353--370.

Shaughnessy, Mina P. "Basic Writing." Teaching Composition: Twelve Bibliographic Essays. Ed. Gary Tate. Fort Worth: Texas Christian University Press, 1987. 177--206.

---. . "Diving In: An Introduction to Basic Writing." The Writing Teacher's Sourcebook. 3rd ed. Ed. Gary Tate, Edward P.J. Corbett, and Nancy Myers. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994. 321--37.

---. Errors and Expectations: A Guide for the Teacher of Basic Writing. New York: Oxford, 1979.

---. "Introduction." Journal of Basic Writing 1.1 (1975): 1--4.

Stygall, Gail. "Politics and Proof in Basic Writing." Journal of Basic Writing 7.2 (1988): 28--41.

---. "Resisting Privilege: Basic Writing and Foucault's Author Function." College Composition and Communication 45 (1994): 320--41.

Tiner, Elza C. "Elements of Classical and Medieval Rhetoric in the Teaching of Basic Composition." The Writing Teacher's Sourcebook. 3rd ed. Ed. Gary Tate, Edward P.J. Corbett, and Nancy Myers. New York: Oxford University Press, 1994. 371--77.

Wall, Susan, and Nicholas Coles. "Reading Basic Writing: Alternatives to a Pedagogy of Accommodation." The Politics of Writing Instruction: Postsecondary. Ed. Richard Bullock, John Trimbur, and Charles Schuster. Portsmouth, NH: Boynton/Cook Heinemann, 1991. 227--46.

CS215530

Would you like to put your paper in ERIC? Please send us a clean, dark copy!

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF EDUCATION
Office of Educational Research and Improvement (OERI)
Educational Resources Information Center (ERIC)

REPRODUCTION RELEASE

(Specific Document)

I. DOCUMENT IDENTIFICATION:

Title: Paper presented at the Watson Conference on Composition and Rhetoric at University of Louisville, Kentucky "A Corner of the Field Defined: Contemplating Name Changes, etc."
Author(s): Bill Bolin
Corporate Source:	Publication Date:

II. REPRODUCTION RELEASE:

In order to disseminate as widely as possible timely and significant materials of interest to the educational community, documents announced in the monthly abstract journal of the ERIC system, Resources in Education (RIE), are usually made available to users in microfiche, reproduced paper copy, and electronic/optical media, and sold through the ERIC Document Reproduction Service (EDRS) or other ERIC vendors. Credit is given to the source of each document, and, if reproduction release is granted, one of the following notices is affixed to the document.

If permission is granted to reproduce the identified document, please CHECK ONE of the following options and sign the release below.

☑ Sample sticker to be affixed to document

Check here
Permitting microfiche (4"x 6" film), paper copy, electronic, and optical media reproduction

"PERMISSION TO REPRODUCE THIS MATERIAL HAS BEEN GRANTED BY Sample
TO THE EDUCATIONAL RESOURCES INFORMATION CENTER (ERIC)."

Level 1

Sample sticker to be affixed to document ☐

"PERMISSION TO REPRODUCE THIS MATERIAL IN OTHER THAN PAPER COPY HAS BEEN GRANTED BY Sample
TO THE EDUCATIONAL RESOURCES INFORMATION CENTER (ERIC)."

or here
Permitting reproduction in other than paper copy.

Level 2

Sign Here, Please

Documents will be processed as indicated provided reproduction quality permits. If permission to reproduce is granted, but neither box is checked, documents will be processed at Level 1.

"I hereby grant to the Educational Resources Information Center (ERIC) nonexclusive permission to reproduce this document as indicated above. Reproduction from the ERIC microfiche or electronic/optical media by persons other than ERIC employees and its system contractors requires permission from the copyright holder. Exception is made for non-profit reproduction by libraries and other service agencies to satisfy information needs of educators in response to discrete inquiries."

Signature: Bill Bolin	Position: Assistant Professor
Printed Name: Bill Bolin	Organization: Texas A&M University-Commerce
Address: Dept. of Literature TAMU-C COMMERCE, TX 75429	Telephone Number: (903) 886-5272
	Date: 14 NOV. 1996

III. DOCUMENT AVAILABILITY INFORMATION (FROM NON-ERIC SOURCE):

If permission to reproduce is not granted to ERIC, or, if you wish ERIC to cite the availability of this document from another source, please provide the following information regarding the availability of the document. (ERIC will not announce a document unless it is publicly available, and a dependable source can be specified. Contributors should also be aware that ERIC selection criteria are significantly more stringent for documents which cannot be made available through EDRS).

Publisher/Distributor:
Address:
Price Per Copy:	Quantity Price:

IV. REFERRAL OF ERIC TO COPYRIGHT/REPRODUCTION RIGHTS HOLDER:

If the right to grant reproduction release is held by someone other than the addressee, please provide the appropriate name and address:

Name and address of current copyright/reproduction rights holder:
Name:
Address:

V. WHERE TO SEND THIS FORM:

Send this form to the following ERIC Clearinghouse:

ERIC CLEARINGHOUSE
on Reading and Communication Skills
Indiana University
Smith Research Center, Suite 150
2805 East Tenth Street
Bloomington, Indiana 47408
(812) 855-5847

If you are making an unsolicited contribution to ERIC, you may return this form (and the document being contributed) to:

~~ERIC Facility~~
~~1301 Piccard Drive, Suite 300~~
~~Rockville, Maryland 20850-4305~~
~~Telephone: (301) 258-5500~~